AN OLD-WORLD STORY.
MARTIN FRANK AND THE MONK OF ST. ANTHONY.

MY HEART WAS OVERFLOWING.

In times of old there lived in the city of Rouen a tradesman named Martin Frank, who, by a series of misfortunes, had been reduced from opulence to poverty; but poverty, which generally makes men humble and laborious, only served to make him proud and lazy; and, in proportion as he grew poorer and more wretched, he grew also prouder and lazier.

He contrived, however, to live along from day to day by now-and-then pawning a silver spoon, or some other trifle, saved from the wreck of his better fortunes.

The fair Marguerite—his wife—was celebrated through the whole city for her beauty, her wit and her virtue. She was a brunette, with the blackest eyes, the whitest teeth, and the ripest nut-brown cheeks in all Normandy; her figure was tall and stately, her hands and feet most delicately moulded, and her swimming gait like the motion of a swan. In happier days she had been the delight of the richest tradesmen in the city and the envy of the fairest dames.

The friends of Martin Frank, like the friends of many a ruined man before and since, deserted him in the day of adversity. Of all that had eaten his dinners and drunk his wine and flattered his wife none sought the narrow ally and humble dwelling of the broken tradesman. He was left alone, save the Friar Gui, the assistant of the abbey of St. Anthony. He was a little, jolly, red-faced Friar, with a leer in his eye, and rather a doubtful reputation; but as he was a kind of travelling gazette, and always brought the latest news and gossip of the city, and besides was the only person that could be trusted to visit the house of Martin Frank—hence, for the want of a better, he was consulted in the light of a friend.

In those constant necessities Friar Gui had his secret motives, of which the single heart of Martin Frank was entirely unsuspecting. The knower of his wife, however, soon discovered two faces under the hood; but who persevered in misconstruing the truth to his intentions, and in dexterously turning every expression of gallantry that fell from his lips. Finally things came to such a pass that the honest tradesman opened his eyes, and wondered he had been asleep so long. Whereupon he was intransigent enough to thrust Friar Gui into the street by the shoulders.

Meanwhile the times grew worse and worse. One family relic followed another—the last silver spoon was pawned, the last silver spoon sold, until at length poor Martin Frank was forced to "drag the devil by the tail" in other words, beggary stared him full in the face; but the fair Marguerite did not even then despair. In those days a belief in the immediate guardianship of the saints was much more strong and prevalent than in these fabled and degenerate times. Accordingly she repaired, one evening, to the abbey of St. Anthony to place a votive candle and offer her prayer at the altar which stood in the little chapel dedicated to St. Martin.

It was already sunset when she reached the church, and the evening service of the Virgin had commenced. A cloud of incense floated before the altar of the Madonna, and the organ rolled its deep melody along the dim arches of the church. When the service was over she repaired to the chapel of St. Martin, and lighted her votive taper at the silver lamp which burned before his altar, knelt down in a retired part of the chapel, and with tears in her eyes, besought the saint for aid and protection. While she was thus engaged the church became gradually deserted, till she was left, as she thought, alone; but in this she was mistaken, for when she turned to depart the portly figure of Friar Gui was standing close at her elbow.

"Good evening, fair Marguerite," said he. "St. Martin has heard your prayer, and sent me to relieve your poverty."

"Then," replied she, "the good saint is not very fatigued in the choice of his messengers."

"Nay, good wife," answered the friar, not at all abashed by this ungracious reply. "If the things are good what matters it who the messenger may be? And how does Martin Frank these days?"

"He is well," replied Marguerite, "and, were he present, I doubt not would thank you heartily for the interest you still take in him and his poor wife."

"He has done me wrong," continued the friar. "But it is our duty to forgive our enemies; and so let the past be forgotten. I know that he is in want. Here, take this to him; and tell him I am still his friend."

So saying, he drew a small purse from the sleeve of his habit, and handed it to his companion. I know not whether it were a suggestion of St. Martin, but that it is, that the fair wife of Martin Frank seemed to find a more willing ear to the earnest whisper of the friar. At length she said:

"Put up your purse; to-day I can neither deliver your gift nor my message. Martin Frank has gone from home."

"Then keep it for yourself."

"Nay," replied Marguerite, casting down her eyes; "I can take no bribes here in the church, and in the very chapel of my husband's patron saint. You shall bring it to me at my house, if you will."

The friar put up his purse, and the conversation which followed was in a low and indistinct undertone, audible only to each for which it was intended. At length the interview ceased; and—O woman!—the last words that the virtuous Marguerite uttered, as she glided from the church, were:

"It would be useless to relate how impatiently the friar counted the hours and the quarters as they chimed from the ancient tower of the abbey while he paced to and fro along the gloomy cloister. At length the appointed hour approached; and just before the convent bell sent forth its summons to call the Friar of St. Anthony to his midnight duties, a man, with a cowl, stole out of a postern-gate, and slipped silently along the deserted streets, soon turned into the little alley which led to the dwelling of Martin Frank."

He was alone. He stepped softly on the threshold of the door, and, as he looked in, he saw the strong arm of Martin Frank himself!

It is hardly necessary to say that his absence was feigned. His wife had invented the story to decoy the monk, and thereby to recover her husband from beggary; and to revive herself from all from the importunities of a false friend. At first, Martin Frank would not listen to the proposition; but at length he yielded to the urgent entreaties of his wife, and the plan finally agreed upon was that Friar Gui, after leaving his purse behind him, should be sent back to the convent with a severe diatribe, and that his shoulders had ever received from any point of view, the most serious turn that was intended; for when they tried to raise the friar from the ground, he was dead. The blow aimed at his shoulders fell upon his shaven crown, and in the excitement of the moment Martin Frank had lost all sense of the quick imagination of his wife suggested an expedient of safety. A bunch of keys at the friar's girdle caught his eye. Hastily unfastening the ring, he gave the keys to her husband, exclaiming:

"For the love of the Virgin, be quick! One of these keys doubtless unlocks the gate of the convent-garden. Carry the body thither, and leave it among the trees!"

Martin Frank threw the dead body of the monk across his shoulders, and with a heavy heart took the way to the abbey. It was a dark, starry night. Not a sound was heard through all the long and solitary streets, save at intervals the distant croaking of a cock, or the melancholy howl of an owl from the lofty tower of the abbey. The silence weighed like an accusing spirit upon the guilty conscience of Martin Frank. He started at the sound of his own breathing, as he panted under the heavy burden of the monk's body. At length he reached the garden-gate, which he unlocked with the key which he had taken from the friar's girdle. He stepped into the garden, and, with a heavy heart, he placed the body of the monk upon a stone bench by the edge of the fountain, with his head resting against a column, upon which was sculptured an image of the Madonna. Then he replaced the bunch of keys at the monk's girdle, and returned home with heavy steps.

When he reached the house, he found the reported delinquency of Friar Gui was not too well known, observed that he was again absent from his post at midnight prayers; he waxed exceedingly angry; and no sooner were the duties of the chapel finished than he sent a monk in pursuit of the traitor, summoning him to appear in the morning. By chance it happened that the monk chosen for this duty was an enemy of Friar Gui; and very shrewdly suspecting that the traitor had stolen out of the garden-gate on some midnight adventure, he took that direction in pursuit. The monk was just climbing the convent-wall, and was about to throw it down, when he saw the shadow of the traitor on the wall, and he was so startled that he fell with a soft falling sound into the deep basin below. As the monk passed on his way he stopped to quench his thirst with a draught of the cool water, and was turning to depart, when his eye caught the motionless form of the traitor, sitting erect in the shadow of the stone column.

"Now is this, Friar Gui?" goeth the monk. "Is this place to be sleeping at midnight, when the brotherhood are all at their prayers?"

"Friar Gui made no answer."

"Up, up! thou eternal sleeper, and do penance for thy negligence. The prior calls for thee at his cell!" continued the monk, who, being angry, and shaking the traitor by the shoulders.

But still no answer.

"Then, by Saint Anthony, I'll wake thee!"

And, saying this, he dealt the traitor a heavy blow on the ear. The body tottered forward from its erect position, and, giving a headlong plunge, sank with a heavy splash into the basin of the fountain. The monk waited a few moments in expectation of seeing Friar Gui rise dripping from his cold bath; but he waited in vain; for he lay motionless at the bottom of the basin—his eyes open, and his ghastly face distorted by the ripples of the water. When the monk heard the sound of the water, and grasping heart the traitor's habit, at length succeeded in drawing him from the water. All efforts, however, to resuscitate him were unavailing. The monk was filled with terror, not doubting that the friar had died; and, when he returned to the convent, he was met by the prior, who, when the deed was known, he should be accused of murder. He therefore looked round for an expedient to relieve himself from the dead body; and the well-known character of the traitor soon suggested one. He determined to carry the body to the house of the noted beauty, and to place the body of the traitor upon the shoulders of some jealous husband. The beauty of Martin Frank's wife had penetrated even the thick walls of the convent, and there was not a friar in the whole abbey of Saint Anthony, who had not done penance for his traitorous imagination. Accordingly, the dead body of the friar was carried upon the shoulders of the traitor, and placed in an erect position against the door. The monk knocked loud and long; and then, gliding through a by-lane, stole back to the convent.

A troubled conscience would not suffer Martin Frank and his wife to sleep in peace; but they were obliged to lament the deed from fear of the monk. The knock at the door sounded like a death-knell in their ears. It still continued at intervals, rap—rap—rap, with a dull, low sound, as if something heavy were swinging against the panel; for the wind had risen during the night, and every angry gust that swept down the alley, swung the arms of the bellows. Martin Frank mustered courage enough to dress himself and go down, while his wife followed him with a lamp in her hand; but no sooner had he lifted the latch than the ponderous body of Friar Gui fell stark and heavy into his arms.

"Jesu Maria!" exclaimed Marguerite, crossing herself, "heavens! the monk again!"

"Yea, and dripping wet, as if he had just been dragged out of the river!"

"Oh, woe, betrayed!" exclaimed Marguerite in agony.

"Then the devil himself has betrayed us," replied Martin Frank, disengaging himself from the embrace of the traitor. "For I fear he is lying here; the whole city was as silent as the grave."

"Saint Martin defend us!" continued his terrified wife. "Here, take this suppository to guard you from the Evil One; and lose no time. You must throw the body into the river, or we are lost! Holy Virgin! how bright the light! this thief round his neck a suppository, with the figure of a cross on one end and an image of the Virgin on the other; and Martin Frank again took the dead friar upon his shoulders, and with fearful misgivings departed on his dismal errand. He kept as much as possible in the shadow of the house, and had nearly reached the quay, when suddenly he thought he heard footsteps behind him. He stopped to listen; it was no vain imagination; they came along the pavement, tramp, tramp! and every step grew louder and nearer. Martin Frank tried to quicken his pace—but, in vain; his knees smote together, and he staggered against the wall. His hand relaxed its grasp, and the monk fell from his back and stood ghastly and upright before him, supported by chance against the shoulder of his bearer. At that moment a man came around the corner, tottering beneath the weight of a huge sack. As his head was bent downwards he did not perceive Martin Frank; still he was creeping up the wall, and when he was in the shadow of the wall, he thought himself safe, and, without waiting to be assailed,
